South Riding Winifred Holtby

South Riding is a novel by Winifred Holtby, published posthumously in 1936. The book is set in the fictional South Riding of Yorkshire: the inspiration being the East Riding rather than South Yorkshire; Holtby's mother, Alice, was the first alderwoman on the East Riding County Council. The leading characters are: Sarah Burton, an idealistic young headmistress; Robert Carne of Maythorpe Hall, tormented by his disastrous marriage; Joe Astell, a socialist fighting poverty; and Mrs Beddows, the firs

South Riding (novel) - Wikipedia

Winifred Holtby was a committed socialist and feminist who wrote the classic South Riding as a warm yet sharp social critique of the well-to-do farming community she was born into. She was a good friend of Vera Brittain, possibly portraying her as Delia in The Crowded Street. She died at the age of 37.

South Riding by Winifred Holtby - Goodreads

Winifred Holtby was an ardent feminist and the book deals with many issues facing Depression England. Her primary focus is the education of women and the effects of the class system on those opportunities, but it also deals tellingly with the developing results of global depression on a small part of England (though there is no such place as South Riding), housing for the poor, and treatment of the insane.

"Winifred Holtby died at the age of 37, one month after the publication of her greatest novel. In her story of the imaginary 'South Riding' of Yorkshire, she strove to preserve for us a part of the changing England that is typical of the whole. To her memory, this pictorial impression of her book is respectfully and gratefully dedicated."
